I find Monster Cable is like the Jordache jeans of the 80s - a better quality product than what's out there genrally, but by far over-priced compared to what benefits you're ultimately getting. I've used some of their snake cabling (StudioLink 27 Channel) when creating my home studio, and noticed a difference in the sound quality - closest thing I can say is that it was cleaner, more defined, a bit more well-rounded.

I'd love

I spent some slow periods years ago helping a techie friend assemble patchbays. The same folks whose patchbays I was helping build were also musical colleagues so I got to see the whole process from a number of perspectives - before, after, d uring. There's no doubt in my mind that cleaning up their cabling and replacing the "bits and pieces" with Mogami made pronounced differences to their sonics - tighter bottom, cleaner top and better stereo soundstage, everything "popped" better.

They were staggered at the improvement.
