clean, though, so if it's purity you're looking for for that genre, they might do the trick.

It is not a card. It is stand alone unit that connects to a computer via 2 - 9 pin "D" type connectors. An in and out. It also has an in and out for MIDI.

Since I got my MacBook Pro, Lucy, back in October, she's become my main computer for most daily tasks. I have the XP machine here for a few things yet, especially since I haven't found an OSX newsreader that works just like Agent, which I've been using for so long I can't imagine using anything else.

However, my main computer at home is a dual-1GHZ G4 that also serves as file server for the house, as well as iTunes jukebox.

I have XP loaded in Parallels on Lucy as well, in addition to an install of XP under BootCamp. I need the BC install because my DeLorme usb GPS puck has a significant amount of latency when running under parallels, but works just fine under BC.

However, between BC, Parallels and OSX, I have two fully-functional, stupid-fast laptops in one shiny package. I love my MBP. A lot. She goes with us every trip we take, allows me to work on the website I maintain while sitting upstairs with the wife, and works as a mobile darkroom with Photoshop.

I may get a copy of Logic Express and a firewire interface and try some recording on her as well.

I just like the way OSX pretty much figures out what it is you want to do, even if you're not quite sure, and then just does it for you.

Rod,

Have you read Geoff Emerick's book, "Here, There and Everywhere"?
Also a fascinating read. Dude was there, had the chops and a band who pushed him, and magic happened.

Wasn't all pretty, though, especially near the end, and he does discuss personalities and stuff.

If you haven't read it yet, get it.

pabl don't have that one. Thanks for the info.

Don't jump into buying new RAM just yet.
Maybe try to remove one or two, and/or swap around.
Your RAM may be fine.
