ATI chipset drivers are still way to bloated for me. Never had good luck with them in DAWs.

As a side note, though, it is funny how we can get the mind set that our lowly keyboard and mouse are such crap controllers. The truth is you can do a hell of a lot with them, and pretty easily, too, especially if you take the time to set up macros. When I was doing a lot of dialog editing I had an extensive set of macros written for Paris and I could work very fast with my right hand on the jog wheel and my left on the keyboard.

Deej wrote:

> <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oQbnPqimRiQI> agree. i just finished mixing and entire album using the mouse / keyboard and while it can be done I would prefer a controller. I had great fine control in cubase using Shift/drag fader but I end up holding down the mouse clicker for long times to write automation. Maybe there's an easier setting I'll have to look up. I would like maybe 4 to 8 motorized faders though and I think that would be grand.

JohnYup, the LS9 is pretty cool! Huge bang for the buck factor and sounds great! Actually, the A/D board is the same for all the live consoles from the LS9 to the PM5D-RH. For post, the O2R96 still beats it because of the monitoring section.

y so it's easy to set up a patch with a couple of bass strings and the rest as normal guitar tuning.

It would sound a little weird if you used the DSP to tune it up an octave and play only the detuned sounds alone.

Bottom line, it's good enough for a lot of stuff, and it's instant. None of the other guitars you mentioned offer it, so it's just icing on the cake. I regularly do live multitracking with a normal guitar tuning, a DADGAD tuning, a drop D tuning, a bass tuning and then throw a sitar part on top, all without stopping to physically tune or switch instruments.

3) Mail order: If I had the option to send it back in case it had neck problems or something, I'd consider buying mail order. But I prefer to buy guitars from a store where I can play them (having said that, I've purchased four guitars mail order/ebay and it's worked out OK except for the Variax _Electric 700_, which has a loose whammy bar).

If you're really picky about neck radius and such, you'd want to play _any_ guitar before you buy it. BTW, the Variax plays better than my Ovation.

I played several _Acoustic 700_ guitars before buying mine, both played well, sounded the same. However the one I took home developed a problem on one string. The store (GC) exchanged it without question. The second one has worked fine for several years. Except last week it cut out in rehearsal. But unplugging the cable (which also carries power) and plugging it back in fixed it.

The only chronic problem I've heard of on the _Acoustic 700_ is that some were finished before the bridge was glued, causing the bridge to rise up over time. I believe Line 6 fixes that for free if you get one of those (or any luthier could probably reglue it). But that was several years ago, probably not even a problem any more.

Finally, just to muddy the waters, Line 6 makes two other acoustic models that are less expensive but lack some of the features of the _Acoustic 700_ (no alternate tunings, I think). One is nylon strung, the other steel. I have not played them. If you prefer the sound of nylon strings, check that one out.

Hope that helps.

Cheers,
-Jamie

DCApple charges 500.00 extra to get an 8-core MP over the 4.
