However, some businesses are more visionary than others, and that distinction is important to me. Even when it's not nearly on the level of the best charitable organizations.

How our culture develops is important, and many businesses are involved in that. Some do better than others. In this case, Apple gets my vote big time over Microsoft. So I will agree with some of Jame's points on that one (with no hyperbole from me, just observing what they've accomplished, for example with the record companies and with electronic distribution of independent music).

Which doesn't mean I won't criticize Apple when they screw up, which they do from time to time (I can give you examples).

And just because I respect many of Apple's accomplishments of late, doesn't mean I will blindly buy every toy from Apple if I don't think I need it. For example, I don't own an iPod. But I do use iTunes.

See, I'm not going that far. That's really getting into straw man territory.

Long week this week? I dunno about you, but I'm really glad to see the weekend, and no gigs for once. That means I get to relax (er, clean the garage, dang!).

Cheers,
