So, if you ever wanted to see Venus in the daytime, now is the time. Right now, (it's 2pm PDT here) if you're in the part of the world where you can see the sun and the moon. If you're not, wait until you can. The moon is far enough east of the sun to see easily if you look for it, and if you find it, Venus is close enough right now (and for the next day or so) to find easily near it.

The moon is about the width of two fingers (at arm's length) east of Venus. They're both pretty high in the sky. If you can find the moon, (its a few days past new, so it's, oh, about an eighth of the way across the sky, behind the sun - where the sun was a couple of hours ago) look a couple of degrees to the west of it, back towards the sun. It's easier if you stand in the shade. See that little bright dot of light? There it is. Take a look.

I think it's cool to see planets in the daytime, but again, I'm easily amused.

-steve

here's a photo of what the angular distance looks like if you're as blind as my camera. It barely even shows the moon. I've made Venus
