I don't know if this is the right documents but I think it's well worth reading what The White House plans to do with the energy situation for

I think it includes cable TV, talk radio and partisan web sites, and it's fed by "think tanks" who are funded to come up with arguments and distractions that support particular outlooks, whether they coincide with reality or not. The products are rationalizations, generalizations, emotional distractions and even villifications. In other words, politics as usual.

In the case of TV/radio, for the sake of spectacle extreme positions are pitted against each other, sometimes without regard for moderate positions. Or a single extreme position is expounded with the help of screened callers so that there is no need to be distracted by evidence or logic that contradicts the particular perspective being rationalized.

In no way do these "entertainment" programs present the full range of perspectives and facts that would be useful for thoughtful awareness, although they usually pretend that they do. Major conclusions built on the basis of what these shows present are likely to be incomplete and faulty.

Add to that the human tendency to proj ect our own experiences, beliefs and prejudices onto others, plus our gigantic egos, and you get the kind of self-righteous certainty that justifies rudeness to others while ironically obfuscating the quest for truth. Also, there's something about communicating via text that allows people to be rude in ways they probably wouldn't be if they were together in an actual room.

In 20 years? Good question.

I simply do not believe anything you say.

You lost all credibility when you used a call to civility as an opportunity for more America bashing.

Shame on you.
