a BartPE disk which is essentially an SP2 live CD, if it's fat32 you can use a Knoppix disk--Knoppix is live CD Debian and the linux tools for write access to NTFS partitions is still a little sketchy because M$oft are such pricks about it). When booted off of the live CD go to c:\%system%[usually Windows]\system32\config\ and rename SAM to SAM.bak in case something goes terribly wrong. Then copy a SAM from the same place on another working SP2 machine with accounts/passwords you know are correct. If everything blows up reboot off of the live CD and get rid of the SAM you moved over and rename SAM.bak to SAM and reboot again.

I do this all the time to machines with registry problems, you can be surprisingly brutal manually screwing with registry hives this way and as long as you keep backups the worst that happens is you have to back out of everything and then it's just as
