That guy used to live here until he got pretty well-known in the past few years, and got sick of people driving by his house & staring in & peeking over his fence, etc, trying to catch a glimpse of the famous guy lol I think he retreated to Santa Fe now.

NeilActually Don, there is a smear campaign going the other way, financed by special interest money (largely Exxon). Meanwhile the facts and evidence are with the scientific consensus (which is why it is a scientific consensus).

You should really read the science.

Unless you have a predisposition to either distrust science or believe things are fine, in which case you can ally yourself with a very few dissenting scientists (there are always a few in the minority on any subject), a cadre of special interest PR folks working diligently to extend Exxon profits, truth be damned, and a novelist.

But you'll be hard pressed to find solid peer-reviewed science to back them up. It's largely speculative, even desperate rationalizations amplified by special interest money that use repetition and talk radio to sound credible but are not. It's a house of cards built on unpublished and unsupported theories, roundly debunked by mainstream science based on facts on the ground and in the atmosphere.

A better path is to acknowledge the trumped up "controversy" for what it is, but then listen to what scientists in multiple fields have actually published in peer-reviewed journals. See how the evidence lines up. And draw your conclusions from there.

If you don't mind reading a matter-of-fact overview, I recommend the Charles Keller paper and its update linked here as a non-hyped way to start:

As for the latest Mars argument, do some research on that one and you'll find it's another red herring. An apples/oranges comparison that doesn't wash.

Finally, if the name Gore makes you see red, then simply ignore Al. This is not a partisan issue and it's not about any one guy. If you can't listen to a Democrat on the subject, listen to the many Republicans who have read the science and are getting to work on the problem. There's a long, long list of Republican scientists, business leaders and elected officials who recognize the problem and are getting to work on it.

Which leads us back to the topic of this thread: the new conservative French President Nicolas Sarkozy said in his acceptance speech that he will make global warming a top priority. For all we know he may hate Al as much as you do. But he recognizes the problem of global warming and is making it a priority.

Cheers,
-Jamie

the internet, no viruses! I'd say, that is reasonably secure. I know many Mac users that have had a similar experience. Mac users don't have to worry about going on the internet with their audio systems. I also know many PC users that have had a completely different experience from Mac users.

I believe there are possible benefits in having a Paris system on a PC over a Mac, if the latest VST plugins are important to you.

And as always, Aaron's advice was good advice!
