your boot.ini file rather than disabling hyperthreading.

The boot.ini file lives at c:\boot.ini. You may have to enable "show hidden files and folder" and/or turn off "hide protected operating system files" to see it by going to "tools - folderoptions - view" and making the changes.

Here's the contents of my boot.ini for reference:

[boot loader]
timeout=30
default=multi(0)disk(0)rdisk(0)partition(2)\WINDOWS [operating systems]
multi(0)disk(0)rdisk(0)partition(2)\WINDOWS="Microsoft Windows XP Professional" /fastdetect /NoExecute=OptIn /INTAFFINITY
C:\ = "Microsoft Windows"

Good luck!

>Hi folks,
While residing in the US, I had been using UPC1250 with no problems. I don't use the thing anymore since I've switched to 240 volts. If anyone is interested in trading the Power Conditioner/Stabilizer for the V.3.0 authorisation (Mac), please let me know, cheers..Rob,

I have never had a signed contract while working on an hourly basis, which is 98% of the time. But at one time I used to charge clients for backing up data before it was cheap and easy to do. I had them sign a form to acknowledge that it was their responsibility to do so. But in recent years, I have come to routinely back up sessions for free without the clients even being aware. However, I still see this as the greatest liability that we have as studio operators. Where clients used to take their tapes home with them, now they seem content to let their work live on our hard drives, trusting that it will always be there.

We always assume everything is ok until something goes wrong. It would be good to have clients sign a form to acknowledge that they are ultimately responsible for backing up data and we can not be held liable in the event of catastrophe.

As for myself, I am planning on renting my space to a reputable band/producer from this area. They will be using the studio and some equipment for a set period of time and I just wanted to get some sort of written agreement stating the expectations of both parties. It's my first time down this road, I usually only do hourly rates and no one else touches my toys...!!

Much more casual than a contract, and will hold up pretty well in court (though I have never needed to do that, and only once can I remember ever having to bring up a point listed in the letter)...
