stand how the mind works).

When you look for and increase the goodness of a person, you can help them improve. From that starting point can man be bettered.

The way to improve conditions is to put attention on increasing the goodness, the health, the production, say Exxon is a tofu burger. Alright? Let's just say they are both inconsequential, however you want to visualize that, so we can let all of that go and talk about something more fundamental.

What if the scientists are right that the greenhouse gases (which actually DO help keep the planet warm enough for human habitation or we wouldn't be here talking about it - those gases) what if they DO retain additional heat when we add to them faster than natural cycles can mitigate?

That's a reasonable possibility. Retaining heat is what greenhouse gases do. As a simple analogy, put on a more insulated blanket at night and you're likely to be warmer, overall.

Possible changes in the atmosphere and the likely repercussions are what many professional and reasonably sane scientists are reporting and discussing.

There is a real chance something is happening in the atmosphere due to human contributions to greenhouse gases. Which means there's a real chance we have to deal with it one way or another. Proactively or reactively. And it's very likely to be easier to deal with sooner than later.

When a Michigan congressman who is one of the main defenders of the auto industry in Washington starts talking plainly about the ramifications of human contributions to greenhouse gases, that's news.

It's not enough to merely tar him as a Democrat. This is the guy who held up updating CAFE. He has not been shy about representing the auto industry.

Cheers,
