
Subject: So I was actually reading the Cubase 4 manual and.....

Posted by [Deej \[4\]](#) on Sat, 27 Jan 2007 03:14:02 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

>www.slicehost.com

>

>for hosting some projects for me and my band. $70 per month gets you 400GB >bandwidth, 1GB RAM, 40GB disk space on a shared server, and it's reserved.

>They'll actually let you use other resources on the host as long as you're >not sucking resources from someone else's account, but they will promise >you this much.

>

>I happened upon them because they are Debian friendly (learning another linux

>distro is about as interesting to me as a poke in the eye with a sharp stick),

>but I'm sure there are similar options for other OS's.

>

>That said, if the guy you're talking about cashed out at a good price, it's >hard to blame him. My guess is if he's been running a successful, well subscribed >web community for a long time if you average out his hourly wage it's literally >less than five dollars per hour. But I'd be surprised if the actual hosting/bandwidth >was a real issue.

>

>TCB

>

>"Uptown Jimmy" <johnson314@bellsouth.net> wrote:

>>Howdy.

>>

>>I was wondering about user forums and hit counts and hardware and >>electricity. How many users can Kim's setup handle, for instance? You >>measure that sort of thing in "hits", right? What is Kim's setup, anyway?

>>How much power does it use per month? How much hardware and power is >>necessary for a site that attracts, say, 3,000 people? 10,000? 50,000?

>>

>>I was wondering these things because a beloved user forum, "Chowhound", >has >>gone completely to shit since being sold by the founder to CNet. They've >>absolutely wrecked the thing, and many of the old-school Hounds have left >>the building, so to speak. The founder claims
