I believe I've heard D'Souza interviewed (PBS maybe) and he seems pretty observant and has a solid view of Islam as well (I've also heard mid-East scholars (native Muslims, not Americans) say the same thing he is).

s a group since that's a broad brush stroke, but in general, Islamic extremists are emboldened by our lack of moral principals as a culture, which as D'Souza points out, is propagated by the non-conservative side of our country. I also have a feeling these terrorists really don't need a solid excuse - just a target to hate, and we fit the bill, as does a good bit of Europe as well (lest Europeans sit idly by and point an accusing finger at us). This is of course leaving out a much bigger story of what has been happening to non-Muslims in Sudan, Iran, Syria, etc for many years. Ours and Europe's time may be coming...

I agree with D'Souza's proposition that an amoral approach in our country (that is usually called "left" since it isn't conservative by intent or belief) is doing nothing to help us in the eyes of extremist Islam, and by nature, propagates a social and moral trend that is obviously offe

Well we should ask why, and we should challenge God at times, and I have been very angry with God on occasion. It's OK, he can take it. Still at the end of the day, we either trust or we do not. I can tell you that trusting is better. Without a doubt.

But we can't. We are all fallen and lost, and we need a savior. Which explains why Jesus did what he did. Yes, sometimes atheists live more moral lives than some Christians, but real Christians are still living better lives than they would have without him. Going to heaven is not a work/merit system, which is why my atheist uncle, friend to Madalyn Murray O'Hare and hater
